

Marker Columns and Rhythm

Table of Contents

Lists	1
Bullets	1
Numbers	1
Callouts	2
Rhythm	2

Lists

A paragraph that ends the run of prose before the subsection below it, so the space the renderer opens between the two can be compared against the space this preview opens.

Bullets

Three depths of bullet

- first item at the top level
- second item, which carries a list of its own
 - nested item at the second level
 - another nested item
 - deepest item, at the third level
- third item, back at the top level

Numbers

Two depths of numbering

1. first step
2. second step, which carries steps of its own
 - a. nested step at the second level
 - b. another nested step

3. third step, back at the top level

Callouts

A listing with callouts

first line of the listing ①
second line of the listing ②
third line of the listing ③

① First explanation.

② Second explanation.

③ Third explanation.

The paragraph that closes this subsection, before the next section starts.

Rhythm

A thematic break stands above this paragraph, and it is a rule an author wrote: the one the HTML backend opens the footnote list with is not, and only that one is suppressed.

A quotation is set at the alignment body text is set at, because the renderer has no alignment key of its own for one and inks its paragraphs at the base alignment.

The Analytical Engine weaves algebraic patterns, just as the Jacquard loom weaves flowers and leaves, and it does so at whatever alignment the document around it is set in.

— Ada Lovelace

A sentence carrying a footnote.^[1]

[1] The footnote's own text, long enough to break across more than one line so that its alignment can be told from its line breaks.